I made a video about a year ago that discusses the great benefits of taking a break from the news. In it, I went over how the news can cause depression, anxiety, and various other unwanted mental states. Today, I want to share with you five ways to stop the negative effects of watching the news. One of the easiest ways to make the news easier to take is to shut it off. You can watch the news once you get home or you can have the television set in another room. The next step is to gather up the news and not look at it. You can put the relevant articles or video clips in a journal or make them into a binder to use as a reference later. The news should not be the focus in the news. Sure, if there is a big story, you can track it down. But you need to keep this in perspective. The news has so many stories every day. If you are intent on reading every single story, the news will never end. The last method is the most powerful. Make yourself a priority. I have my computer on timers. I let myself have a break from checking the news and do something else. This can include anything from video games or watching series to reading a book. The key is to recognize the negative effects news has on you and to take steps to avoid it. Make plans to get away from it in any way you can, whether this is reading, gaming, or letting a little time pass. If you are going to be faced with a newsworthy story, sit in a quiet place and do something else. Let the news take its course without you. When you are doing something else, perhaps your mind will automatically travel to the news, you will feel depressed, and you can get back in touch with the positive things in your life. We present the case of a young woman who underwent surgery for a retroperitoneal mesenchymoma. The tumor was composed by cells admixed with numerous vascular elements, suggesting that it was a benign mesenchymoma. However, immunohistochemical studies performed on several sections of the tumor demonstrated no evidence of mature muscle tissue. The mesenchymoma's cells were reactive with the markers listed in Table 1. There was no cellular atypia or cytologic atypia. The histology and immunohistochemistry findings are consistent with a benign mesenchymoma. Even though benign mesenchymomas are relatively uncommon, they must be considered in the differential diagnosis of retroperitoneal neoplasms. In these tumors, the best therapeutic option is surgical resection. When the tumor is located anterior to the spinal cord or when the cells display severe atypia, however, chemotherapy and radiotherapy must be considered. Hematological correlates of biotransformation of tacrine. The hematological effects of the histamine H1-antagonist tacrine have been investigated in a therapeutic dose-ranging study of chronic, high-dosage administration in patients with Alzheimer's disease. A dose-dependent decrease in hemoglobin and hematocrit values was found, which reached statistical significance for hematocrit at an oral dose of up to 1500 mg/day. No other changes in blood cell counts were seen, nor was there any evidence of iron deficiency or other hematological abnormalities. Similar dose-dependent decreases in red cell indices were also observed in rabbits after the administration of a single oral dose of 750 mg/kg. The effects seen in patients were ascribed primarily to the binding of tacrine to erythrocyte membranes resulting in membrane fluidity alterations and reduced hemoglobin-oxygen affinity. This study provides further evidence for the acute toxicity of tacrine and suggests that erythrocyte membrane changes may be a useful pharmacodynamic marker for H1-antagonist treatment of Alzheimer's disease.
