Here's what Barack Obama had to say about Donald Trump, Hillary Clinton, and the 2016 election: Per a statement from the former U.S. president's office, Obama addressed the political climate and the outcome of the 2016 election: For our children and our country, the results of the election were not a referendum on the "diplomacy" of our previous president; they were a referendum on the leadership our previous president bequeathed to his successor. I happen to believe that Hillary Clinton would have been a good president. I do not believe that Donald Trump is going to be a good president. I do not intend to comment on every stupid thing he says or does. I am not going to spend my time arguing with you about anything he says. What I will do is to speak plainly and candidly to the American people, and to the world, on issues where we can do some good. That means talking about our values and our history. On foreign policy, I had a high degree of confidence in Hillary Clinton as a commander-in-chief. I continued to have a high degree of confidence in Hillary Clinton as secretary of state. And what I saw in the aftermath of a Trump administration was a foreign policy that was chaotic, was unclear, was naïve, and was at times, frankly, just plain stupid. But I also believe that at their best, the practices of the previous administration helped pave the way for a more cooperative international order, including leading the fight against al Qaeda, containing China, helping in the fight against Ebola, and in containing Russia and Iran. I do not think that the fundamentals of our economy or our politics or our values have substantially weakened in the past eight years. But there are reasons why the global economy is still struggling and so many
