Losing a job is both stressful and potentially risky. Employees who get fired are significantly more likely to have high blood pressure, higher alcohol consumption, a greater incidence of smoking, eating disorders, and depression than employees who do not experience involuntary job loss. A growing body of research suggests that the social and psychological stresses experienced in the wake of a job loss can have long-term health and financial consequences. This article reviews the findings from several studies that looked at the health and financial effects of a job loss in college students. In general, the health impacts appear to be greatest among those with the lowest socioeconomic status and most of the economic effects were either short-term or neutral.

However, the economic analysis also raised concerns about whether the job loss could have long-term financial consequences. Additionally, the studies have yet to identify the conditions under which a job loss is most likely to have long-term impacts on health and economics. As the Sheriff's Office continues to investigate Monday's
